Support media literacy at your library

The proliferation of fake news makes it far more challenging for information seekers to evaluate the validity of sources available to them. Internet users often get mixed results as unverified sources and advertisements are interspersed with credible news sites. As librarians know better than anyone, sorting the good from the bad takes time and skill.

Experts concerned about the spread of misinformation online believe librarians play a key role in building media literacy. By providing a resource designed for reliable research, librarians can foster essential critical thinking skills while also curbing the negative influence of fake news. That’s where NewsBank can play a vital role.

According to a 2016 study from Stanford University’s Graduate School of Education, 80% of students cannot distinguish “fake news” sites from legitimate sources.

A reliable partner in a world of questionable content

With NewsBank, your users can feel confident that the information they’ve retrieved is trustworthy. Our team of experienced editors rigorously screens each news source to verify its credibility before it is included in our resource. This careful process ensures that every search result comes from a dependable, vetted source. And because we provide nearly 11,000 sources — from printed newspapers to online news — researchers enjoy access to an unmatched breadth of reliable information.

For more than 40 years, NewsBank has provided libraries around the world with reputable news sources. To learn how we can improve information literacy in your library, call 1.800.762.8182.